Despite being one of the least studied and claimed films by Andrei Tarkovsky, his first film shot abroad, Nostalghia, offers many of the main ideas that characterize the entire filmography of the great Soviet filmmaker.

This documentary attempts to retrieve and review the real significance of that film through a series of notes: some fundamental images (many of them not seen before), the story of some of the main protagonists of that shooting, the return to the original sites mentioned in the film (both in Russia and in the original locations of the film in Italy) or the series of Polaroid photographs that Tarkovsky made while preparing the filming.
